1997, 1998). The authors argue that the use of the present perfect is a sign of the speaker's perception of the event as being relevant to the present, and that this is what makes the use of the perfect with the past tense possible in the first place. In contrast, the use of the perfect with the past tense is not possible in the second case, because the event is not perceived as being relevant to the present. This is why the perfect is not used with the past tense in the second case.
